FLORENTINE MOSAICS. INTERESTING PROCESSES BY WHICH

In continuation of the description we gave he other day, from Sir D. E. Colnaghi's report, we give some interesting facts about Florentine mosaics—the "objects of art" of which nearly every visitor brings back son

The proper technical term for the so called Florentine mesaics is works in "commesso." They are composed of delicate slices of stones carefully cut into shape, arranged and joined together ("commessi") with a fine cement, and then fitted into a thin slab of marble

After the design had been prepared the thin dices of stone selected for the various parts are distributed among a certain number of workmen, each of whom completes the portion of the design intrusted to him, the whole subject being substantially united. The stones, after being cut into the required stones, after being cut into the required Bahnsen's drug store. shapes, are carefully set together with a cement made of wax and mastic ("pece greca"), heat being used to bind them together. Slate is employed to support the work during its progress, and to line it when complete. At ach stage the first lining affixed to the separ ate parts is ground down, and a fresh one apite parts is ground down, and a tresh one applied, so that an even surface may always be secured. The slices are fur-ther sawn into the shapes required to form the various parts of the design by iron or copper wire attached to bows, and always with the aid of emery. The finest emery powder ("poltiglia") is used for polishing the surface of the stones, and emery is employed the slab, and having wooden handles, being and most genial of remedies. It is not astonishing, therefore, that, on the industry being popularized, it should have been atamilies residing near Florence, and they are sutirely without previous culture. As many of them never learn to draw, the designs for the works are made by special draughtsmen. Although artists in mosaic had been employed by Duke Cosmo de Medici in previous years, the foundation of the royal factory of "pietre dure" in Florence may, perhaps, be considered to date from about the year 1574, when some rooms in the Casino di San Marco were assigned for the residence of the masters of the art. The permanent establishment dates, however, from September, 1588, when the artists, by order of the Grand Duke Ferdinand I, were transferred to the Uffizi. Here the factory remained until 1796, in which year it was removed to the suppressed con-year it was removed to the suppressed con-vent of S. Niccolo, in the present Via Ricasoli, where it still exists, though transferred to a different part of the building, with entrance on the Via degli Alfani. For about two cen-turies and a half the production of the Floren-tine pressures had remained a monorals of the tine mosaics had remained a monopoly of the royal factory; it was not till 1825 that Signor Gaetano Bianchini commenced the industrial application of the art to small articles of jewelry and ornaments. The art seems to have flourished in Florence from the date of its introduction. It has been doubted whether the introduction of the art of working in mo the introduction of the art of working in mo-saic into Florence, under the patronage of the grand duke of the house of Medici, is due to Tuscan or Lombard artists, as it would ap-pear to have flourished contemporaneously in both regions. While, however, it has died out, or nearly so, in Lombardy, it has survived in Tuscany to become an important branch of Florentine industry.—Pall Mall

The Climax. The "rest cure" has reached out and claim ed the earth; the vacation business has struck tweive. We read in a paper down in Dauphin county, Pa., that "Caleb Warner, one the oldest farmers in the county, has gone to the country for a few weeks vacation." That's enough. We expect to learn one of these days that Commodore Quarterdeck has gone to sea for his health.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.
